Suzanne Simon Baptiste Louverture, an unknown heroine

Abstract :

Toussaint's companion was part of his fight at every moment of his rise in the revolutionary and political sphere of Santo Domingo.

A black woman born as a slave on the Breda Plantation in Haut-du-Cap. Wife of Toussaint, mother of his children and his adviser for twenty years. A leading woman, she was the center of Toussaint's life. He would never have become the man he was without Suzanne's help. She took in charge of his business; managing his properties and his slaves. She took care of her family while he devoted himself to his various duties all over the colony for the governance of Santo Domingo. Her contribution as Toussaint's collaborator in the revolution was totally ignored. So was the case of most women involved in the Santo Domingo's revolution. Deported to France along with Toussaint, she moved from Brest to Bayonne and then to Agen where she died uprooted and ignored by historians. She does not deserve to die in oblivion without telling her tale.

The role of the Haitian revolution in the struggle for emancipation

Abstract :

Haiti keeps flowing into multiple crises, its sovereignty suffers an increased cut back, public policies further are reduced at the request of the IMF and the Haitian people are infantilised. In a context of poverty, job insecurity and dehumanisation, levied by many external actors, the number of gangs in the social and political spaces has increased and their violence seems limitless.

Meanwhile, the street is ignited and the growing crisis deteriorates Haitians life. The alternative solution is to involve an international armed force, at the request of the current Prime Minister, so as to restore order "by force" and to secure main services. The UN Secretary General has subscribed to this request. Such an intervention raises the question of its relevance. And in case of humanitarian crisis, would it not be seen as a kind of interference while taking responsibility of the aspects of public security?

The role of certain external actors must be questioned: some of them adopt an overhanging position with respect to the Haitian people, which reminds the attitude adopted by France when she left the country and by the United States during its ten-year occupation. We must then analyze the permanence of the coloniality of the power over a country and of the coloniality of The Being over a people who was the first to establish a black republic. What does it say about the progress of the fight against structural racism and its impact on international relations while , since 2015, a decade for people of African descent has been set up to fight against structural racism?

Louisiana faces the Haitian syndrome (the great revolt of 1811)

"We were going to the city (New Orleans), to destroy all the white people".

(Jupiter Congo at the Tribunal of the parish of Saint-Charles, February 20, 1811)

Abstract:

On January 8, 1811, an estimated half a thousand slaves from St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, and St. James parishes rose up and marched resolutely downriver to storm the Louisiana metropolis of New Orleans. They killed two white men and did huge damages to the plantations they crossed. Armed with rifles, swords, sticks, or simply with their tools, they were not stopped until January 11 after a fierce battle with local militia. Two detachments of regular troops had been mobilized, but the militia had already done the bulk of the massacre. One of the harbingers of the 1811 revolt was the upsurge in marooning throughout the German Coast. This revolt was linked to internal conditions exacerbated by the deadly work on the sugar plantations. The Haitian revolution served as a catalyst.

Keywords : Louisiana, Haiti, slavery, sugarcane, revolt.

The Haitian "ghost" and black emancipation in Argentina

Abstract:

At the beginning of the 19th century, the Spanish domains in the Americas were dismembered. The viceroalties became independent and gave rise to American nations, breaking all ties of subordination with the former metropolis. In Argentina, this revolutionary conjuncture introduced the issue of slavery as an institution. This culminated in the Constitution of 1853, mingling political change and abolition. In this process, Haiti offered a more or less desirable mirror to look into, suggesting that the end of slavery was inevitable.

Through documentary research, this essay proposes to travel the long journey to freedom of enslaved black people in Argentina and to show the influence of the Haitian revolution on the direct and effective action of blacks in their emancipation.

Toussaint Louverture: an American destiny 1743-1803

Abstract:

The purpose is to situate the revolutionary gesture of Haiti in a more human and global context by insisting, on the one hand, on the heroic dimension of the personal trajectory of the revolutionary General, and, on the other hand, on the global geopolitical vision that inspired his action.

A little-known figure of Malagasy nationalism

Abstract:

As the first "black" Republic proclaimed in the world, Haiti plays a symbolic role of choice for emancipation movements worldwide. However, in Madagascar, during the colonial period, the figure of Toussaint Louverture did not impose itself as a reference of choice.

Nationalist discourses prefer to evoke progressive and anti-colonial French personalities (notably politicians from the French Left Wing) and almost voluntarily "forget" the political struggles led by personalities from the African or American continents. This could be explained, by the isolation of the Big Island (its insularity). But it seems that the other reason is to be found in the internalisation of certain racist values borne by colonization. This contribution will focus on the influence of the Haitian revolution on the Malagasy nationalist movement.

Vincent, slave of Bourbon Island, sentenced to death, pardoned but condemned (1824-1834)

Abstract:

In the fall of 1824, the slave Vincent was accused of raping a woman belonging to the white population of Bourbon Island. He was found not guilty for lack of evidence. He was nevertheless sentenced to death on appeal. However, his sentence was not immediately carried out because the governor of the island asked the King to pardon him. It was the auditor, the maître de requêtes Delamardelle who was in charge of studying the request for pardon. A native of Santo Domingo and a magistrate, like his father, he defended Vincent, who, according to him, had been unjustly sentenced to death by a lenient colonial jurisdiction, being complacent towards the grievor. or. A decade had passed before Vincent's fate could be definitively sealed, a decade spending in prison, for the sake of safeguarding public tranquility, for which the Bourbon Privy Council acted as the guarantor.

This paper aims to review the key facts of this affair, which highlights the mere (or even the absence) of consideration for the accused slaves, the dubious dispatch of justice by certain Creole (or related) magistrates, and the gap that exists between the colonial world and the perception of it from Paris, even for those with a great deal of experience in colonial matters such as Delamardelle.

Abolition in the Indian Ocean: A Comaparative Study through three Islands (Madagascar, Sri Lanka and Sumatra)

Abstract:

The historiography of the Indian Ocean is incomplete without the uncomfortable narrative on slavery and its Abolition. Gaps in our knowledge of Abolition are inevitably associated with a lacuna in understanding the many morphs of slavery itself. Museums can play a key role in promoting public understanding of, not only the past, but also the prolonged and complex process of Abolition, its actors and key players. Indian Ocean commercial transactions and the slave trade became entangled with colonialism and empire building. Abolition is a necessary topic and part of the legacies of slavery. The momentum from the Atlantic impacted on the Indian Ocean but participation of several European colonial powers and the diverse religious and cultural practices of the local rulers complicate the process of Abolition. Three islands in the Indian Ocean - Madagascar, Sumatra and Sri Lanka – are included in this paper to view the drivers behind ending the slave trade and slavery. The central question is whether economic forces, or moral and ethical arguments, or more likely a blend of the two, provided the internal momentum towards a common goal.

The unsung heroes of Reunion's freedom in phase with Toussaint Louverture

Abstract:

The history of slaves who freed themselves on their own, commonly called "maroons", has been studied until now mostly by placing the focus on the dominant (rulers, masters). It is perceived as an act of resistance and writes a new page in the history of slavery, while the workers who fled this iniquitous system of exploitation of human beings by human beings rejected both the slave system and the colonial system. They saw themselves as free individuals who had only one ambition to : live free. The fact that all those who suffered persecutions and valuing the slave system and did not want to hear the message of these freedom fighters, do not take away the nobility of their act. They are opening a new page in their history in an unlawful way, indeed but with freedom. It has nothing to do with slavery. This presentation aims to raise the issue of these facets of the life of these freedom heroes that anticipated the fight of Toussaint Louverture. The history of freedom is not the history of slavery

The lid on the pot, or the illusion of mastering marooning in Santo Domingo on the eve of the Haitian Revolution

Abstract:

If the influence of marooning in Santo Domingo and the role of maroons in the Haitian Revolution are the subject of unresolved debates among historians, this paper proposes a new approach, that of taking the problem from the angle of repression on the eve of the great revolt of 1791. Indeed, how did the slave system attempt to control the marronage phenomenon in the large colony, and how did the maroons manage to slip through the cracks? In fact, marooning contributed to the aggravation of tensions, to the point of acquiring a legendary aura, to be revisited.

From Santo Domingo in the Caribbean to Bourbon in the Indian Ocean - Study of the slaves of the Dominjod family 18th - 19th centuries

Abstract:

The Dominjod family is a family of French colonists who lived between the end of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th century in Santo Domingo and Bourbon Island. The study of some authentic and private documents puts the observer directly attuned to the realm of the property in one of the richest French colony of that time. And we can particularly focus our attention on the servile gentry (gender distribution, occupations, origins, illnesses, etc.), while tracing in filigree a comparative dimension with the slaves of the Bourbon Island.

From Toussaint Louverture to the resistance of the Maroon slaves of Mauritius: a solidly formed and organized community!

Abstract:

Mauritius Island did not experience a slave revolt as was the case in Reunion Island in 1811, with the revolt of Saint-Leu, or in Haiti in 1791 by Toussaint Louverture.

This contribution shows, first of all, that despite the absence of revolt, there are similarities between the slaves refusing the system of slavery and the revolution of Toussaint Louverture. This is the case of the maroon slaves of Mauritius; they managed to form a solidly organised community in order to remain free until the abolition of slavery. The mountain of Le Morne was their place of refuge.

Secondly, this contribution establishes that the maroon slaves were resisters because, according to Mauritian historiography, the Dutch left the island due to their inability to control them. Mahé de Labourdonnais was sent to Mauritius during the French period to solve the problem of the maroon slaves. Under British administration, Colonel Draper was also responsible for ending the maroon slave community. In each and every case, the maroon slave community could not be destroyed because of their organization.

Toussaint Louverture: when an idea (1789) is taken literally

Abstract:

When Toussaint Louverture joined the insurrection of black slaves, as a doctor, led by Dutty Boukman during the Bois Caïman ceremony on August 14, 1791, he thus addressed the slaves and offered them as a horizon of struggle "the global freedom »: "I want freedom and equality to reign in Santo Domingo" (Jean Fouchard, 1972). Indeed, imbued with the ideas of the thinkers of the Enlightenment and taking at face value the emancipatory message of the French Revolution, he questions the racial and social hierarchies, and the established privileges, and claims the right of enslaved blacks to freedom and justice. 'equality.

Thus the analysis of his speech (memoirs and correspondence) and of his various figures (Paul Paumier, "Figures of Toussaint Louverture") shows that Toussaint Louverture inscribes the insurrection of the slaves in the logic of the French Revolution but "it was necessary to brutalize the historical actor enough, so that he agreed to play his role until the end" (A. Césaire, Toussaint Louverture, 1981), that is to say to abolish slavery and oppression colonial.

How to interpret and what to represent about slavery? Critical analyses of experiences and practices

Moderator: Ibrahima SECK

(Director of Research, Whitney Plantation Slavery Museum, Louisiana) –
(Senegal)

After several decades of efforts and experiences to break the silence on this tragedy, and in view of the multiplication of projects throughout the world to create museums dedicated to this history, it has become necessary to take stock of the approaches and museum practices used, to question the musicographic narratives, to put into perspective the historical, sociological, artistic and political approaches, and to decompartmentalise the knowledge and practices on this history. What have been the different approaches used in museums so far? What are the limits and challenges encountered in staging a heritage that has become immaterial due to the destruction of material evidence? What lessons can be drawn from these experiences? What new ethical, conceptual, methodological and technical frameworks should be put in place to address the profound gaps that remain in the transmission of this common heritage? What possibilities do information and communication technologies (ICTs) and multimedia offer for renewing the interpretation and representation of slavery and enriching the experience of visitors, especially young people? How can these approaches fit into the broader reflection on the redefinition and re-foundation of museums? How could existing slavery museums or those under construction benefit from this dynamic of paradigm change?
